Lansky Loses Third Bid to Enter Israel

By RON LABRECQUE
Herald Staff Writer

Late Thursday afternoon, Meyer Lansky sat in his comfortable Miami Beach apartment overlooking the ocean and covered his disappointment with a joke.

"Maybe I'm an excommunicated Jew," he said, laughing.

The premier underworld financier had just learned that, for the third time, the Israeli government had refused him entry under rules that normally welcome almost all Jews automatically.

CALLED THE Law of Return, it smooths the way for Jewish immigrants to the tiny Zionist state. But not Lansky, declared a danger to public safety by the Israeli Supreme Court.

"I'm not a threat to Jews or society," Lansky said. "I'm a Jew, and I want to go to Israel just as any other Jew would."

Last September, Israeli authorities refused Lansky permission even to visit for a 10-day vacation.

He is 75 now, and for several years, according to his doctors, has been in extremely poor health. He has prepared for death by purchasing two gravesites in the centuries-old Mount of Olives Cemetery in Jerusalem.

When Israel rejected him last year, he told his rabbi, "I'll be there anyway," in a reference to the gravesites.

"I DID it on my own," Lansky said Thursday about his decision to try again two weeks ago. Without help from the lawyers who have protected him or the rabbi who sometimes has guided him, Lansky said, he wrote a letter to Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin.

Begin quickly turned the letter over to an old Lansky foe in Israel, Interior Minister Yosef Burg.

Burg five years ago headed an intensive investigation that led to Lansky's deportation from Israel, where he had lived more than a year with his wife, Thelma.

In his letter to Begin, Lansky said he wanted to live out his life in Israel.

Burg again said no.

Lansky wasn't surprised. "I know his position," Lansky said. He said he didn't mind that Begin didn't personally make a decision. "I don't care who (the letter) was given to."

THE AGING Lansky, who acts like a kindly grandfather in public, always has discounted law enforcement reports about his supposed prominence in organized crime.

"I don't care what people think about me, just the people who have dealt with me," he said.

"They can't indict me unless they frame me, like they did on that tax case," he said, referring to his 1972 federal indictment for income tax evasion. A Miami jury in 1973 chose not to believe Mafia member-turned-informant Vincent (Big Vinnie) Teresa and acquitted Lansky.

LAW ENFORCEMENT authorities estimate that Lansky — who operated a gambling syndicate in Florida 25 years ago, was involved in pre-Castro Havana casino night-life and allegedly has had hidden connections with Las Vegas and European casinos — made many millions of dollars and rose to mob prominence through illegal gambling.

"I hope you stop gambling," he said, facetiously, referring to the current debate over legalization of casino gambling in Florida.

"You make such an issue of it, but it's something just like the noses on our faces. It won't go away," he said. "Why not stop it all then? Why run betting odds in the newspaper? Why don't you stop making cards?"
